

U.S. Department of Justice
Federal Bureau of Investigation

*The FBI shares intelligence information
to the greatest extent possible while ensuring the protection of sources and methods.*

Sharing Intelligence Information

For additional information or assistance, please contact the Field Intelligence Group at the nearest FBI Field Office or the Intelligence Relations Unit, Washington, DC, at (202) 324-3000.

March 2005

Who may obtain FBI intelligence information?

It is the intent of the FBI to share intelligence information to the greatest extent allowable by law with those having a valid need for the information.

Customers include the law enforcement and intelligence communities, other domestic and foreign agencies, and, when appropriate, the private sector.

What types of intelligence products are available?

The FBI produces three types of intelligence products:

- Intelligence Assessments
- Intelligence Bulletins
- Intelligence Information Reports

Intelligence Product Content

Intelligence Assessments

FBI Intelligence Assessments fully address tactical or strategic intelligence or technical (e.g., cyber) requirements. Assessments contain analytic judgments to support intelligence or law enforcement operations.

Intelligence Bulletins

FBI Intelligence Bulletins disseminate information, in an article format, on significant criminal or national security developments or trends of interest to the intelligence or law enforcement communities.

Intelligence Information Reports

IIRs contain raw information, which has not been fully evaluated but is of current interest to intelligence consumers.

How do I obtain products?

Many FBI intelligence products are posted within shared network environments, such as Law Enforcement On-Line (LEO), Intelink, and SIPRNET. Products are also delivered to specific customers through other official dissemination channels